Quite possibly financed by the British Tourist Board to make people think twice before booking that foreign holiday, this badly misconceived fiasco follows a predictably diverse group of twentysomething blokes (one black, one gay, one woman-hater etc) as they decamp to Greece for a week of boozing, shagging and urinating on each other. In truth, with something akin to a decent plot, this could have been a triumph given both the unknown cast's believable performances and the stunningly photographed locales. But Dunkerton's script jack-knives between cack-handed philosophising and sub-Greece Uncovered depravity in such a disastrous manner than it makes the similarly-themed Kevin And Perry Go Large look like truly deathless art. ★★
